make themselves acceptable to the Yaksas. The priest created a thousand goats, a thousand sheep, and a thousand buffaloes by throwing soybeans on the ground and transforming them with special incantations. The animals were fabricated in great quantity because the Yaksas were known to be meat eaters with excessive appetites.

The king then asked Karkotak to go on ahead, make himself tiny, enter the body of the Yaksa king, make him ill, and stay there until they arrived so they could cure him. Karkotak did exactly as he was instructed and the demon king soon grew very sick. Nothing could cure the pain in his stomach. When the king, the priest, and the farmer arrived in Kamrup, they announced that they were physicians from Nepal. The desperate Yaksas pleaded, "Please help our king, for he is dying!" Her eyes flamed, and it became immediately apparent that it was far too dangerous to remain in the demons' kingdom for another moment.

They escaped. But outside the borders, in hiding, they made a new plan — they would capture the spirit of the prince and take it home with them. Elaborate rituals were performed, then Karkotak was sent back to the castle with a bit of magical soot to smear upon the forehead of the child. Immediately, the spirit of Prince Lokanatha was seized with an urge to travel. The Yaksa doctor was called in, but the prince was so possessed that his spirit left its body in the night and flew in the form of a sacred bee to the hidden travelers.

The next morning, in the castle, the Yaksa queen discovered Prince Lokanatha's dispirited, lifeless body. She woke all
